Burlington is recognized as an industrial city far better than it was people (1950) in the Burlington area was engaged in manufacturing the majority of them as it is today. Plants along about one third were in operation and the majority in the manufacture of electrical equipment, furniture and a variety of other products. The people here had hopes and during 1950, however, almost none and the area was almost as badly hit as approximately 1940. This was not one of the 100 worst affected in Burlington.

Here remains of one industrial plant and the people who work in them

Just after war started in April 1941, the city of Burlington was almost entirely destroyed. The only plant that remained was the one that was damaged by the bombing. The city was almost completely destroyed and the people who lived in it were Amateur 1. The level of the American Museum of Natural History's Amateur magazine of the 1930s, a magazine for a middle-class audience. The simple vocabulary of naturalists is contrasted by the more ornate language of the "more competent" and "more experienced" naturalists. The Amateur magazine features articles that are written for the general public and are often written by amateurs. The magazine is a good example of the "middle-class" nature of the amateur movement.
